In patrilineal society, both boys and girls take their social identity from the father and are placed in his linkage - kutumb. But while a son is a permanent member of this unit, a daughter is viewed as a transient or not permanent member. A son is supposed to continue the patriline; the daughter will not be continuing the line as her son will carry on his father's line. After marriage, a daughter is supposed to visit the parental home only for short periods. The cultural emphasis on the marriage of the daughter and her near permanent departure is well entrenched. Our folk songs and folklore are suffused with this message. Ordinarily, marriage does not take place among the near kin relations. Of course, some exceptions of marriages of cross cousins, or between a maternal uncle and niece among the Hindu communities in Southern India, and marriages between cross or parallel consins among the Muslims do not substantially affect the concept of temporary membership of the daughter. By and large property is inherited by male heirs and transmitted through them. According to the traditional legal practice, daughters have only the right of maintenance and to marriage, including the gifts and goods acquired at the time of marriage (streedhan), which are determined by the status of the family and the caste to which the family belongs.
