Propaganda is a word that has undergone notable semantic changes in the course of its history. Today, the concept of partisan indoctrination, whether by fair means or foul, is so commonly attributed to this word that it has almost shed its original connotation as the act of spreading by word or deed an acknowledged truth. One has become used to the pejorative handling to which it has been subjected, and such terms as 'clever', 'insidious', 'subtle', 'clumsy' and 'slick', which are often coupled with propaganda attest to the perversity of current usage. In fact, modern methods of publicity and mass circulation have invested the word with terrifying potentiality. What cannot propaganda do? It is not only the subservient handmaid of politics, but the inseparable ally of religion. Herein lies both its strength and its weakness. Propaganda may be used effectively to disseminate lies and pernicious ideas as, again, it may be used ineffectively to inculcate truth and wholesome ideas. It is like a two-edged sword which in the hands of unscrupulous, can wreak havoc on the whole people, just as it can achieve incalculable good when wielded by wise hands. Modern ideologies and attitudes have thrived almost solely on the soil of propaganda and the fruits it has produced have been astounding. Propaganda has succeeded in making black white and white black. (223 words).
