(B) The situation in the country calls for a determined and united effort to check the forces of disorders. Nothing can be more illusory than the assumption that the task of maintaining law and order can be left safely to the government. Policemen can and do enforce order of a kind but ultimately it is society that must discipline its unruly members, who form only a small body. What is seen in the country today is the attempt of minority to tear the whole fabric of Indian democracy into tatters. Should the majority of law-abiding citizens only look on helplessly while the few misguided people incessantly indulge in violence? Should every issue, however trifling, be permitted to be magnified into national one and disturb the peace? This need not happen if the minority of fanatics is made to realize that they will not always have their own way so far the majority has been virtually at the mercy of the few fanatics. This timid attitude must give way to a positive will to safeguard democratic values. The task is by no means easy for apathy has gone very far, but thoughtful man must grapple with challenge.
