- “Law is a great discipline for the mind. It teaches you how to think clearly precisely and accurately. Every word has a definite meaning, and must find its’ proper place in its own context. Verbosity and diffuseness are foreign to a well trained mind. Such a legal mind is essentially logical, and has the courage to face the results of its own mental, processes and not to hide them under a cloud of rhetoric and declamation. There are many people who confess that they cannot understand how advocates defend bad causes. There is also belief that an advocate’s functions consist of, for the most part in showing white as black and black as white. The only answer that one can give to this popular misconception is the famous answer that Johnson gave to Boswell, when he was asked what he thought of an advocate supporting a case which he knew to be bad. Johnson’s answer was that the advocate did not know it to be good or bad till the judge determined it for him and for others. Therefore, the duty of the advocate is to do his best for his client. He is after all the client's mouthpiece, and he must put before the court all aspects of the case which are favorable to his client. But he must do so fairly, without misleading the court, and without concealing from it anything that it is his duty to divulge. But he is not concerned with the final result. That rests with the judge, and it is ultimately for the judge to decide which side is right and how justice should prevail."
